Violence in Mississippi. (Correspondence of the Richmond Dispatch.) GREENWOOD, LEFLORE COUNTY, MISS., )

October 12, 1877. The dignity of the leading newspapers of "Big Richmond" will not recoil, I am sure. from occasional correspondence with even such a hid-away place as Greenwood; and. indeed, in view of the stirring events happening at intervals in our midst, such correspondence might not always be uninteresting to your readers. It seems really that the commencement of our second national century has become an era of bloody and relentless violence unparalleled in the annals of our country-at least, judging from the accounts we are daily getting from almost every quarter. I regret to say that this section of Missis-sippi-my adopted sojourn (for I am a Virginian and shall return to Virginia)-is not exempt from such lawless excesses. It is to record an instance in point that I write

On last Sunday night, the 7th instant, about midnight, an armed and masked band of about twenty men walked quietly but rapidly into Greenwood, stationing pickets along their route, and leaving their horses at the ferry, some five hundred yards below, on the Yazoo river. They proceeded at once to the house of the jailor, Mr. John H. Groves, and, calling him to the door, covered him with their cocked revolvers and demanded the keys of the jail. Groves, being a fearless, resolute man, essayed a parley with the maskersof course to no avail-and was forced, under protest, to surrender his charge. The "regulators" then proceeded to the gave battle with a brick he had somehow maskers a heavy blow on the breast with it other studies .- Norristown Herald. as he entered the cell. The latter instantly pulled on him with his revolver, bringing him down, at the imminent hazard of striking others-mostly negroes-in the crowded cell. That shot alone would doubtless have proved fatal in an hour or two. Shelton was then roped round the neck and dragged down the steps and out of the jail-yard, when one of the fateful visitants (he who had been struck with the brick) placed his pistol near the dying man's temple and gave him the coup de grâce. Meantime the other victim (Moore), who had also received a bullet through the bowels, though not yet in a dying condition, was brought out; and, after the restoration of the keys of the prison to Mr. Groves, the whole posse, with their mortally wounded prisoner, hurriedly decamped, leaving the dead man lying where he fell. The entire time occupied in the sanguinary transaction did not exceed twenty minutes. Next (Monday) morning the victim who was carried off was found hanging from a beam of an old cotton-shed just below the ferry, and across the river, nearly half a mile from town.

Shelton-the one that was killed at the jail-was awaiting his trial for an attempt to murder a planter of this county by the name of Bush Woods, with whom he was living and working at the time, about two months since. He deliberately shot Woods down in his own house, with a detail of aggravated barbarities, and rifled the premises of all the money-they contained-about one hundred dollars. Then fleeing to the woods and cane, he eluded pursuit for over a week, although a large reward was offered for his capture, dead or alive. He was finally taken, however, and lodged in jail here, when most of the money and Mr. Woods's pistol and shot-gun (which he had taken away) were recovered from him. He denied nothing, and laughed and chatted quite pleasantly over his adventures as a fugitive in the woods.

The other culprit and victim, B. C. Moore, was some months ago instrumental in the death of an old and respected citizen of this county, a Mr. G. W. Markham, who, while riding home one evening, was waylaid and shot, though not fatally, by Moore, on account of some slight previous misunderstanding between them, entirely incommensurate in importance with the revenge thus sought to be taken.

All the parties were white men, and Markham and Woods held a good social position here. The former being quite old, the public indignation was great against his assailant, who was comparatively a boy. Mr. Markham subsequently received an injury by a fall from his horse, and this, together with the effects of Moore's bullet, caused his death very soon.

Bush Woods is still lying in a very critical condition-completely paralyzed from the hips down-and his physicians say he cannot recover.

The three brothers of Moore were in town to-day, gloomy, resolute, and reticent, trying, in a quiet, penetrative way, to learn all the particulars of the tragedy as regards their brother. They cornered our worthy jailor and interrogated him ex-haustively, and circulated gloomily among our townsfolk, sullenly gathering particulars. About noon they quietly rode away. But everybody could see in them the stern resolve on a bloody vengeance if they ever learn who were the perpetrators of that midnight butchery; and more truculent work very soon is apprehended. The community is in a state of high and indignant excitement over the matter.

I neglected to state that the sheriff was not in town on the night of the event recorded, and the jailor (who is also deputy sheriff) was placed by it in a very embarassing position, and one that yet may prove not devoid of danger.

CARABIN.

RETRIEVED HIS REPUTATION .- The Minneapolis (Minn.) Tribune of Thursday says: "The children of Mr. Moore, who live at Upper Lake Minnetonka, have a retriever pup they are proud of. The occasion of their pride resulted from a little circum-stance the particulars of which are as follows: The eldest daughter went to the Mound-City store to make a few purchases, with a pocket-book containing $14 deposited in her pocket; but when she came to settle her bill she had no pocket-book to draw from. It was lost. A search was instituted, but fruitlessly, and it was mourned as among the pleasant memories of the past. A short time afterward the children were presented with the pup, very young and full of tricks, and regarded by the women folks as a great nuisance. It had a way of bringing in things that were a worry to neat housekeepers, depositing fish-heads, dead squirrels, chipmunks, and the like on the clean floor every time it had been scrubbed. But one day, about two months after the loss of the pocket-book, the pup made its appearance with a small black object that secmed to have great value in his eyes, for the small children could not make him drop it, and it required the services of the elder portion of the family to dispossess him of it. An examination brought the discovery that the object the pup fought so dogfully for was nothing less than the lost portmonnaie, and the family were immediately raised to the very pinnacle of happiness and pride-happiness in having the lost greenbacks restored, and pride in the fetching capacity of their pup."
